Eleven-year-old Abdul Bashit was excited when he met his hero, Saiman Khan, recently. Abdul, a resident of Pakistan, had developed severe jaundice soon after he was born and was diagnosed with Crigler Najjar Syndrome. This condition is seen in 1 in a million babies and causes a toxic form of bilirubin to develop in the blood. To prevent complications like brain damage and hearing loss, Abdul underwent continuous phototherapy in the hospital for the first two months of his life, and was then discharged, after which he continued the phototherapy treatment. As he grew older, his skin thickened and the light penetration decreased, making it less effective. His jaundice increased and he had to stay in the phototherapy unit all night. Since the only permanent treatment was a liver transplant, he was referred to Indraprastha Apollo Hospitals, Delhi.

Dr Subash Gupta, chief liver transplant surgeon, says, "Abdul's maternal uncle volunteered to be the donor and the family travelled to India for a liver transplant. He underwent a successful liver transplant on October 30 and was discharged on November 17." Dr Anupam Sibal, group medical director, Apollo Hospitals Group and senior consultant, paediatric gastroenterologist and hepatologist, Indraprastha Apollo Hospitals, said, "We are privileged to have earned the trust of so many patients over the last 17 years, since we performed the first successful liver transplant in India in 1998. The family wanted to meet Saiman Khan and were delighted that Abdul could meet his hero in Mumbai." Starting with the first liver transplant in India in 1998, they've performed 2,300 liver transplants. Since 2012, their Delhi hospital has remained the busiest solid organ transplant centre in the world.

INTERVIEW | DR ANUPAM SIBAL

'Children Hate to be Compared to Siblings, Classmates and Friends'

Drawing on two-decades of his experience as a paediatrician and a parent, Group Medical Director of the Apollo Hospitals Group, Dr Anupam Sibal, shares insights on how to effectively communicate with children in his new book Is Your Child Ready to Face The World? Excerpts from an interview:

demics, extra-curricular activities and distractions in the shape of numerous gadgets make heavy demands of our children's time, it is tough to communicate with them.

What is the best method of communication?

Communicating with children is becoming more complex. Based on my experience as a paediatrician and father, I have described a technique to communicate with children that I developed in my book Is Your Child Ready to Face the World? that explores the crux of parenting, asks and answers if your child is ready to face the world.

What are the values that you believe are important to inculcate in kids?

The values I have touched upon include gratitude, compassion, forgiveness, giving, integrity, humility, among others.

Is communicating with one's children an art or a science?

It is an art and a science.

Is there a perfect age to engage with children?

As parents one must find time to do things we enjoy together with our children. I think it is

Why did you write the book?.

Because I have seen in recent times a breakdown of the parent-child relationship, the most beautiful relationship that God created.

Difference between the role of a father and mother in raising kids?

Both have equal roles and responsibilities. However, no matter how hard a father tries, he can't even come close to the love, care and compassion that a mother has for her children.

How helpful has been your experience as a paediatrician in writing this book?

Twenty years of observations, interaction and experience as paediatrician was most valuable.

Why is it difficult to communicate with kids these days?

In today's world, where aca-an exercise that should commence around the age of 12 or so.

Please share dos and don'ts.

Children hate to be compared to siblings, relatives, classmates, neighbours and friends. It leads to negativity. To reprimand a child for a mistake is detrimental; a logical discussion is more useful. Trying to pass a judgment is damaging. Parents need to strictly avoid adding the pressure of performance in an already stressful environment children find themselves in today. Encouragement, praise, motivation, suggestions, patience (loads of it) and a gentle nudge (rather than a push) work. Walking the talk is crucial.

In God on the Streets of Gotham: What the Big Screen Batman can Teach Us about God and Ourselves, Paul Asay writes, "Forget Batman: when I really thought about what I wanted to be when I grew up, I wanted to be my dad." For pediatrician Anupam Sibal, Asay's early sentiments would probably be testament to a father having discharged his parental duty well. In his first non-medical book Is Your Child Ready To Face The World? published by Penguin, Sibal draws upon his years of experience of interacting with parents and children, and his own experience as a father to help parents — especially fathers — reach out effectively to their children. "As for my personal experience as a parent, I always made it a point to try to get 15 minutes of undivided attention from our son, Devaang. I would try to get this time with him when he wanted to; that was the challenge I took on... It could not be a sermon; it had to be a two-way conversation with me nudging him to talk about some recent incident. I would then dip into my limited repertoire of stories and incidents, and find an example that would fit in with the mood. Each story was structured in a way that touched upon a value that I believed was important," writes Sibal.

In 18 chapters, the author gives readers a glimpse of his interactions with his son and the values that he has tried to pass on — humility, beating the odds, courage, handling pressure, making mistakes and accepting flaws, being a dreamer, finding one's calling, compassion, making others happy, not giving up hope, determination, giving, gratitude, being the change, honesty, the importance of goals, that it's never too late, and forgiveness. In each of the lessons that he has tried to impart to his son, there is a lesson for parents too. But what sums it all up, and should serve as an important guide, comes in the concluding lines: "I realised that if Devaang was to believe in the values I wanted to instil in him, I needed to walk the talk." Sibal writes about the importance of why parents need to lead by example.

While there is no dearth of self-help books in the market, and certainly not on the subject of parenting, Sibal's book is refreshing for its absence of sermonising. The author tries to engage his readers in the same way that he has been engaging with his son, and allows them to learn from his experience. The content is rich with anecdotes of his interactions with his son, his patients, and their families. Most of the dos and don'ts are summed up in the conclusion. The rest of the book talks about the manifestations of the values he feels are important. For example, while talking about the need to forgive, he doesn't simply mention having given the example of Nelson Mandela to his son. He goes on to talk about Mandela's life and how the leader had strengthened South African society. He talks of a young patient losing interest in life because he felt himself wronged and how forgiving those who hurt him, helped improve the quality of his own life.

While talking of dreams, he dwells on the lives of Abraham Lincoln and Martin Luther King Junior. While this might feel like a digression, the anecdotes help along the story-telling style adopted by the author. For the enterprising parent, they would add to his own stock of narratives to share with his children. The language is not exemplary. For example, while talking of Monty Roberts' dream of owning a horse ranch and his teacher's reaction to it, Sibal writes, "When he asked the teacher 'on' why he had received a F..." Sibal, however, earns brownie points for his honest admission that he provides only a father's perspective, and finely balances his appreciation of a mother's importance in a child's life with the need for a father's support. "Has my experiment with Devaang made a difference to his life? I have no idea how he will turn out. I do, however, have the satisfaction of having tried," writes Sibal. That same satisfaction should remain with the author in having made an honest attempt in letting other parents profit from his experience.

Hijacking your child's life choices: If somewhat controlling our kids' lives isn't enough, some of us insist on choosing a life partner for them too. Most of us do that because of the age old tradition of "mommy and daddy know best". "If you want your child to be happy, then let them make their own decisions," says Dr Sibal. "Don't make assumptions about what kind of partner your child may or may not like. It is always better to talk and discuss with your children on what makes them happy," he adds.

Thou shall not impose: It's rather odd that when your child decides to gift one of his toys to a beggar, you go ahead and stop him because you think that the toy is too expensive. "Never impose your opinions or your set of ideals on your child, says Dr Sibal. "We can do our children a big favour by not interfering with their acts of compassion. We should rather encourage them when we see them doing their best to be kind. In fact, we should learn to be compassionate from our children," says Dr Sibal.

New Delhi: Abdul Basit aged 11 years, a resident of Pakistan and the eldest of 3 siblings, developed severe jaundice soon after birth. He was diagnosed to have Crigler-Najjar Syndrome.

This condition which is seen in 1 in a million babies causes a toxic form of bilirubin pigment to rise in the blood.

To prevent complications like brain damage and hearing loss from this condition, Abdul underwent continuous phototherapy in the hospital during the first 2 months of his life. Thereafter, he was discharged to go home and continue the phototherapy treatment.

As he grew older, his skin thickened and the light penetration decreased making it less effective. His jaundice would increase and he would miss school as that he could be under the lights as long as possible.

All night, he would remain under the phototherapy unit, bearing the intense light and the heat for survival. The persistent yellow colour of his eyes and skin began to bother him. Since the only permanent treatment was a liver transplant, he was referred to Apollo Hospital, Delhi.

According to Dr. Subash Gupta, Chief Liver Transplant Surgeon, 'Abdul's maternal uncle volunteered to be the donor and the family travelled to India for a liver transplant. He underwent a successful liver transplant on 30th October 2015 and was discharged on 17th November 2015.

Pak boy gets new life in Delhi, meets Salman in Mumbai

thestatesman.com New Delhi, | 08 December, 2015

Salman Khan meets Abdul Basit and his mother

Suffering from a rare liver disorder, 11-year-old Pakistani boy Abdul Basit's trip to India had a fairy tale ending as he not only got rid of the life-threatening condition but also met his idol, superstar Salman Khan.

Eldest of three, Abdul developed severe jaundice soon after birth and was diagnosed with 'Criggerlaj Najjar' syndrome, a condition that affects one in a million babies.

To prevent brain damage and hearing loss from this condition, Abdul underwent continuous phototherapy treatment using intense light and heat back home. However, liver transplant was the only permanent cure and Abdul was eventually referred to te Indraprastha Apollo hospital, Delhi.

"Abdul's maternal uncle volunteered to be the donor and he underwent a successful liver transplant on October 30 (2015) and was discharged on November 17. He will soon join school and lead a normal life," Subash Gupta, Chief Liver Transplant Surgeon at Apollo, said.

"With the new liver Abdul has received, the enzyme he was not born with, he has finally bid adieu to his constant companion, the phototherapy unit," added Anupam Sibal, Group Medical Director, Apollo.

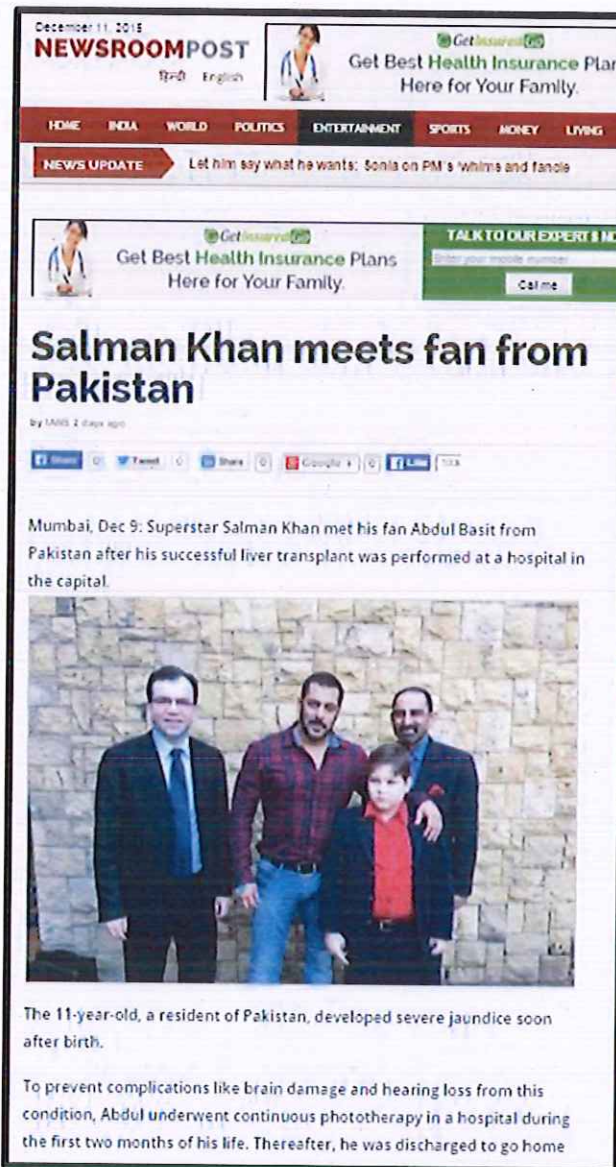

Gifted a new lease of life, Abdul expressed his desire to meet his idol Salman Khan while recuperating in the hospital.
